Building a thriving organization today involves many moving parts, from great products and services to high-powered teams, bulletproof systems, a thriving online presence, and the ability to scale. But one of the issues that's often neglected is preparing for the cyber-attack or the real-world catastrophe that no one hopes for and most would prefer not to think about. In this talk, Melissa Agnes helps her audiences think about and prepare for the unthinkable. Audiences will learn what it means to create a crisis-ready culture that is both vigilant and resilient.

Crisis Management – Through the Digital Noise

One of the unspoken fears of every executive team is the adequacy of the response to the cyber-attack, the toxic leak, the rogue employee or the incident that threatens the integrity of the organization. How does a company come back from a disease outbreak like Chipotle's, or a systemic failure like VW's? Too many teams put off thinking about the unthinkable, and the result is ill-preparedness. In this talk, Melissa Agnes helps business teams understand today's risks and what it takes to prepare the entire organization to respond swiftly and professionally when disaster strikes.

Preparing for the Cyber War

Every CIO knows today that his/her organization is one click away from a hack that could bring the financial integrity of the company down. And every IT team has spent time and money anticipating, preparing, and forestalling such attacks. But at a deeper level, every organization has to be ready to both support and respond to IT warfare with an organization-wide awareness and planning that few organizations understand, much less have accomplished. In this talk, Melissa Agnes reveals to audiences what it takes to prepare the whole organization to shoulder the burden that the IT team currently bears.
